A photograph showing a close-up view of a traditional thatched roof. The structure is composed of numerous wooden beams, some of which are dark and weathered, and others that are lighter and appear to be part of the internal framework. The roof is covered with thick layers of dried straw or reeds, which are densely packed and layered. The lighting is somewhat dim, highlighting the textures of the wood and the straw. The overall appearance is that of a well-used, traditional building structure.
